

How to use this list
The world of merchants and their products in historical reenacting is vast and varied. Hundreds of different groups, sites and organizations have their own standards for authenticity, and the specific requirements of these standards generally fall under four categories:
form	Form is the outward appearance and function of an object. If the form is correct, but the materials and construction are wrong, you can look somewhat accurate from a distance, but these items should not be considered historical reproductions. It is very rare to find an item that is both made of the wrong material and uses the wrong construction method but still has an accurate form.
material	Material affects form and function. For clothes, the material affects the construction technique, changes how the item fits over the body, and can affect the items utility. For example, a broadcloth coat is fairly waterproof and fire resistant, and linen clothes are very comfortable in hot weather.
construction	Products made individually by hand are fundamentally different than those made using modern production methods. Clothes are assembled differently, power tools leave recognizable marks on metal and wood, and hand tool joinery uses different methods than power tool joinery. Entirely handmade items will command high prices and long wait times commensurate with their demand, quality, and skill to make. Practical options for most reenactors balance affordability, availability, and accuracy and frequently use modern construction methods for hidden seams/joints/etc while all visible features are done by hand.
context	Even if a product has the right form, correct material, and historical construction, it can still fall short of some authenticity standards. "Context" is using an item that is appropriate to the specific time, place, and persona you are portraying to the best of your ability. An item's context can evolve as the research evolves, however context should be supported by multiple primary sources. Although there may be evidence something existed, it might not be recommended due to the item's rarity, exclusive use in different cultures, or the item was used by a different subset of the population than what you portray (e. g. military vs civilian). In general, when portraying common folk it is best to aim for the ordinary rather than extraordinary.
Many of the most skilled artisans in this hobby dont have websites with products you can purchase directly. There are a number of merchants listed here with nothing more than a facebook page or an email. You will need to contact these artisans in order to make a purchase and each one may have different preferred methods of communication.

There is a wide range of historical accuracy among the shops in this list. Some are not 18th century shops at all, but are good sources for raw materials. Several of the general sutlers have a huge variety of items from different sources, some more accurate than others. Some items are pure fantasy, others are "historically inspired" or might come from later eras. Some are machine stitched and hand finished, some are polyester. It is up to you to research the item you are looking for and compare it to the applicable authenticity standards. If you have questions about the accuracy of a particular item I highly recommend searching through the additional resources tab to do some research. Post questions in forums, talk to a mentor, ask around at events. There is always more to learn!

The shops are labelled 1,2, and 3 under the following definitions using the best information available while making the list and input from the community as a whole. These labels are not indicative of product quality per se, they are merely to help point you find a product that best suits your needs, authenticity standards, and comfort with personal research vs relying on item descriptions.

1. Items found and sold here are most likely to meet the highest standards in historical accuracy and quality, using period correct materials and techniques as much as possible. These artisans are recognized masters of their craft; many take only custom orders, and are often very highly specialized, but will most likely help you make the best choice for your particular impression. Because of this, you might expect longer wait times and higher prices, but you will not be compromising on accuracy or quality. There are few shops in this group.

2. The vast majority of shops and default category. Most products found and sold here are likely to be perfectly acceptable for most historical authenticity standards and may be of middling to high quality. They may be made partially or fully with machine stitching, power tools, or other modern methods, but generally are of proper form and material and most have solid supporting documentation. As this is the largest category of shops, and the shops in this category tend to have a broad range of items, the historical accuracy and quality can vary greatly from item to item and shop to shop.

3. These shops tend to carry a wide variety of items that can vary greatly in historical accuracy. Some may blend products from different eras and regions with unclear boundaries between them or may have inaccurate descriptions. Some of their products may be geared towards historical costuming rather than living history, may use modern materials, or could have visible signs of modern construction methods. They may also have insufficient or no supporting documentation. These shops tend to be the most budget friendly with ready made items and in some cases products can be modified to improve their accuracy. Pay attention to a product's form, materials and construction and compare them to your applicable authenticity standards.
